Outcome Report

G protein-coupled receptors (GPCRs) are the membrane receptors that act through heterotrimeric G proteins (guanosine nucleotide-binding proteins). The human genome encodes over 800 GPCRs for detecting various signals, such as hormones, growth factors, endogenous ligands, light, etc. More than 100 GPCRs are still "orphan receptors" without any known ligands. GPCRs share a common structural arrangement of seven transmembrane helices. An external signal (first messenger) activates a GPCR from outside the cell; it activates the G-protein which produces second messengers. The role of GPCRs in vision, olfaction, gustation and many common human conditions (allergies, depression, cancer, cardiovascular defects, etc.) have been discussed. The overall outcomes were satisfactory.
